“ As I read the paper today, my heart broke. The passing of your mother is your personal loss, but it is also a loss for everyone who knew her. I cannot express the gratitude I have for having known her. Rosalie was a special person. In the over twenty-five years she was with the agency, she brought a level of patience and tolerance (traits I know I lack) to the job that helped to make the business a success. Her personality helped to brighten the day for everyone who entered the building. She was a constant. To call her only employee would be a disservice to her contribution.

More importantly, she was a friend. I grew to respect her opinions and often tempered my decisions based on what Rose thought. As I said, she could exercise more restraint than I was capable of. I know there must have been times that she just tolerated me and I appreciated that. Looking back, she was party to every major event in my life. The birth of my children, the loss of my father-in-law, and the sale of the business all happened during those years that she was with the agency. Though all those changes, Rose remained.

As the years have passed, I would see your mother out and about around town. We would talk for a few moments. She would ask about my family and then we would go our own ways. The thing that always struck was that she had never changed. She was still the Rosalie I knew. There is something reassuring about that.
